Comparative politics: The state of the subdiscipline

In earlier decades, there was a consensus about a specific comparative method. It was differentiated from a statistical and from a case-study methodology, and it emphasized through the use of strategic controls the isolation of key variables that could explain variations in outcomes. However, Laitin argues that this consensus is no longer representative of the field.

Comparative Politics: The state of the subdiscipline

Comparing and contrasting political phenomena in a variety of different cultural settings, situated at the nation-state or sub-national level, should be an integral aspect of the new and growing field of Gender and Politics. Too often, both empirical and normative.
